President Finley, of the Southern, Says When Railroads Are Hurt Public Suffers.

NOT FIX RATES ARBITRARILY

This Cannot Be Done on Basis of Capitalization, But Is Regulated by Economic Laws.

GREENSBORO, N. C., April 3 -At the annual banquet of the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Club, of Greensboro, to-night, W. W. Finley, presi-

He points out that some of the arguments as to overcapitalization were bused on estimates of average cost of construction that might be ample for lightly-built and lightly-equipped roads in level or nearly level country with few bridges and tunnels, and without expensive city terminals. He said: "When the entire facilities of the carriers are considered, including rights - of - way through cities, towns and elsewhere, terminals, yards, roadbed, tracks, tunnels, structures, and equipment, I think it will be admitted by all persons acquainted with the cost of railroad construction that the property of these carriers could not, generally speaking, be reproduced at a cost equal to their capitalization. But, leaving aside the question as to whether the railroads of this country are overcapitalized, I wish to say to you that the idea that rates are controlled by capitalization is entirely without justification. Capitalization as entirely without justification. Capitalization as entirely without justification control a carrier's rate, and hence cannot affect the investing public."

He supported this statement by quotations from President Hadley, of Yale, and from Chairman Knapp, of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Mr. Yinley gave examples of the competition of producing localities, of markets, of carriers, and of commodities to show tion of producing localities, of markets, of carriers, and of commodities to show that railway charges are the butgrowth of economic laws and commercial conditions.

Econome Laws Fix Rates.

Economic Laws Fix Rates,
"No rate," he said, "can ever, with proper consideration for the business of the country or of the carriers, be made independently of these economic laws—not by again arbitrarily fixing the rate, and not by capitalization of the carrier, likewise arbitrarily fixling the rate. In a broad sense, therefore, the management of a railway is powerloss to fix its rates. It must the carrier, likewise arbitrarily fixing the rate. In a broad sense, therefore, the management of a railway is powerless to fix its rates. It must accept the rates that are the resultant of conomic and commercial forces, salvage claim of 140,000. The Axminister which are as absolutely beyond the powerless to he had a substitute of economic and commercial forces, which are as absolutely beyond the control of its managers as are the tides of the ocean. That this is true is further shown by the fact that many valleads have never been able to pay relificades have never been able to pay dividends on all of their capital stock, while others are unable to pay any dividends at all, and still others are not able to pay interest on their bonded

"If a railway could adjust its rates to its capitalization there would be no reason why any road should not earn dividends on its capitalization, and thus forever shellsh receivershire and banksh receiverships and bank orever abous receiverships and bank-ruptcy.

"In all the discussion about the sup-posed relation between railway capitali-zation and rates, I have been unable to find that any one has attempted to formuzation and rates, I have been unable to find that any one has attempted to formulate a comprehensive and practicable scheme for basing rates on capitalization. I am convinced that if eav one should seriously undertake to work out such a scheme he would soon find it to be absolutely impracticable. Take the case of two railways competing for business betwent two common points. One of them may be a line constructed through comparatively level country at relatively small cost, and the other may be constructed through a mountainous country at very heavy cost. The capitalization of the mountain line may very properly be two or three times as grent as that of the low-grade line.

If rates should be based on capitalization the rates on the mountain line would be two or three times those on the other, and the mountain line, because of high rates, would be put out of business between the competitive points. The loss of its business between these points would probably make it impossible for it to carr from non-competitive business alone enough to may the interest on its bonds. It would go into the hands of a receiver with no prospect of ever getting out. This presents only one of the minor difficulties in the way of basing rates pur capitalization. A perfect mage of the most intricate problems would be presented if it should be undertaken to adjust rates on different classes of commodities on any such basis. Still another set of difficulties would be confronted in fixing the rates to and from different points, whether competitive or non-competitive. The ratemaker would have to know in advance just the tohnage of each class of commodities that would be carried, not only as a whele, but the tonnage of each class to and from each station."

Erroneous Conception.

boro, to-night, W. W. Finley, president of the Southern Railway Company, responded to the toast "North Carolina and Its Relation to the Rail-pud Problem."

After discussing the interest of North Carolina in Improved railway transportation and pointing out the need of additional railway construction in the State, Mr. Finley spoke of the identity of the interests of the public and the railways, and showed what would be the effect upon both of some of the proposed legislation. He said:

"The interests of a railway and of the proposed legislation. He said:

"The interests of a railway and of the proposed legislation. He said:

"The interests of a railway and of the proposed legislation in saying till at every legislative proposition that is inlimical to the railroads will be found, on careful examination, to be occulally inlimical, in its ultimate effects, to the interests of the people of the turritories served by their lines."

As to Overcapitalization.

Mr. Finley said that, while capitalization of the railroad must be considered on its merits, he was convinced that there was serious popular error in supposing that there is any considerable overcapitalization of rail-roads in the United States.

He points out that some of the arguments as to overcapitalization were based on estimates of average cost of construction that might be ample for lightly-bulk and lightly-equipped roads in level or nearly level country with few bridges and tunnels, and without ex-
